Fertility NEW ZEALAND

Walks alongside all people facing fertility challenges

About us

Having the choice to create a family is a fundamental part of our humanness – encountering difficulties in having or completing a much-wanted family is unexpected and can be very challenging to deal with. The confusion, frustration and grief encountered with fertility problems are invisible and often not understood by family and friends or even by health professionals, which can leave people feeling very isolated. Intense feelings such as anger, sadness and grief are a natural part of dealing with fertility problems. However these feelings are often minimised and invalidated by others, so support from people who understand is especially helpful.

FertilityNZ was founded in 1990 and is a national organisation with volunteers in all regions of New Zealand and is a registered charity. Much of FertilityNZ's work is carried out by dedicated volunteers.

- One in four New Zealanders will be affected by infertility during their lifetime.
- Infertility is most simply defined as not being able to achieve conception after a year of unprotected intercourse (or the deemed equivalent for single people and same sex couples), or not being able to carry pregnancies to a live birth.
- Infertility is a medical condition and is recognised as a disease by the World Health Organisation.
- Approximately 30% of infertility is male factor, 30% is female factor, 30% is both and 10% is unexplained.
